Supplementary information

In addition, in the 1970s and early 1980s Australia conducted the KARINGA project. The KARINGA project included design trials of an indigenous cluster munition, as well as operational test and evaluation trials. The trials of the KARINGA project did not result in a production run. The KARINGA was not certified for operational employment, was never introduced into service, and has not been used in any operations. Most of the Karingas were destroyed in the early 1990s, along with the CBU-58s that it was baselined against. The remaining samples of cluster munitions were made inert and are not defined as cluster munitions under the Convention on Cluster Munitions. Notwithstanding they are retained for training and counter-measures purposes consistent with the Convention.

Supplementary information

Australia previously tested limited numbers of cluster munitions on Australian military weapon test ranges in the 1970s and early 1980s. These sites are active military weapon test ranges and have continuously been used to test a variety of ordnance over the decades. The ranges are still used today for weapon and munition testing. These ranges are regularly risk assessed and cleared to the requisite standard for an active military test range. The ranges do not pose a threat to civilians as they are geographically remote, appropriately marked, and public access is restricted and controlled.
